DAILY EMPIRE.

[This translation from the German ballad of Baron Tilditz is by Clarence Mangan.] It seems particularly appropos at this time of European war, when one might well imagine the restless spirit of the first Napoleon hovering over the moonlit fields which were the scene of his military exploits.

When midnight hour is come, The drummer forges his tomb, And marches, beating his phantom drum To and fro through the ghastly gloom.

And the yellow moonlight shines On the old Imperial Dragoon, And the Carabiniers they form in lines, And the Carbanciers in platoons.

Then around the chief once more The Generals and Marshals throng; And he whispers a word of command To the ear of his aide-de-camp.

Shall the Robin be Destroyed. The members of the Horticultural Society of the old Dayton State, are holding a meeting on foot at the first meeting, last year, a petition, a petition, a petition to the Legislature, asking that
